THE WATT COLLECTION

Introduction

The Watt Collection in the Science Museum Library consists of 118 titles covering a range of subjects from chemistry to Christianity. The collection was owned by James Watt (1736-1819) and is associated with the garret workshop of his home in Heathfield, Birmingham. Upon his death the contents of the workshop passed to his son, James. No one entered the room or disturbed its contents during his lifetime. His great-nephew James Gibson Watt inherited the house from James Watt junior who died in 1848. In 1857 the house was let to Thomas Pemberton, the art critic and connoisseur. At some point during his tenancy, Gibson Watt decided to re-open the room, after which time Pemberton's son, Thomas Edgar Pemberton, followed by a number of others, examined all the objects in the room. In 1876 George Tangye, the engineer, leased Heathfield and lived there until his death in 1920.

The house itself was demolished in 1924 and its owner, Major J. M. Gibson Watt, a direct descendent of James Watt, decided to present the contents of the room to the nation. The contents were moved to the Science Museum in London where an exact replica of the workshop was built. Major Gibson Watt supplemented the workshop's contents with a large number of objects which had, at some period in Watt's lifetime, been in the Room, but afterwards had been moved elsewhere. These included the collection of books and periodicals listed here. The garret workshop is due to be redisplayed in the Museum in 2010. The books and periodicals were moved to the Science Museum Library in 1987 and were catalogued. This listing is derived from the computer records for the items and is supplemented by a subject index.

The collection does not constitute James Watt's entire library. Many items were moved elsewhere, including all his books on the steam-engine. However it does contain many contemporary works of interest, including books by, and about, fellow members of the Lunar Society. It also sheds some light on Watt's own character and certainly the large number of medical works act as a testament to his own ill health.

The Science Museum Library contains a vast wealth of material relating to the work of James Watt. Apart from numerous biographies and histories of steam engines, available in London, there are many contemporary books and periodicals held at Wroughton. The archives of Watt held in the Boulton and Watt Archive in Birmingham Central Library are also available on microfilm in London. To consult items from the Watt Collection please contact the Library at Wroughton, see contact details page.
